Closing prices of October 28, 2011

The rally off the October 4th lows continued last week as the S&P 500 advanced 3.78% for its fourth weekly gain in a row. The highlight of the week was a big gain on Thursday that propelled the index through multiple resistance levels. The catalyst for Thursday's rally was good news regarding Greece and European banks and third quarter GDP numbers. Our count of lopsided (+90% advancers or +90% decliners) trading days increased by three last week, making that thirty-three out of the last sixty-two sessions and an amazing sixteen of the last twenty-seven, based on the S&P 1500. There have been fifty-eight so far in 2011. That compares to forty-seven for all of 2010, thirty-nine in 2008, and a mere fourteen back in 2006.

The S&P 500 is up 13.58% so far in October, which is on pace to be one of the best months in decades. Looking at other big months through 1971 we constructed this table of the top twenty months and what happened during the three months following the big gain:

Average three-month performance +4.38%.

We would expect to see some type of regression to the mean after a month that shows an outsized gain, but it is difficult to see any clear pattern from the data other than it tends to be positive with a small amount of negative occurrences during the three months following the big monthly gain. On the other hand, some of the big up months were followed by surprisingly strong performance in the three months afterwards.

The improved technical picture we have discussed the last few weeks continues to strengthen. Last week the S&P 500 broke through multiple resistance levels in the form of the neckline of the head & shoulders pattern, price resistance at broken former support levels, the 200-day moving average, and the Fibonacci 61.8% retracement level of the entire move down from the May top. On Thursday the S&P 1500 recorded 491 thirteen-week closing highs, the most since 538 on 11/5/10.

In the short-term stocks are overbought and price action like this should result in a one to two week consolidation. Two weeks ago we said we hoped earnings would be a catalyst for stocks to ignore their overbought condition and trade higher. Even with the current extreme overbought condition it is possible the forward momentum will continue as earnings continue to come in and we enter periods of positive seasonality in the very short-term and for the next three months. In addition, our proprietary options indicator has dropped below the neutral 1.00 level to 0.96, showing that options buyers are gearing up for a drop. We like to see pessimism because it should keep whatever consolidation/pullback we do get from being very deep.

Valuations based on spreads between equity and bond yields have plunged from levels we had never seen before as stocks and bond yields jumped up in tandem. They remain at a level where stocks should be attractive versus bonds. We are almost two-thirds of the way through third quarter earnings season, and reports continue to come in nicely.

So far 324 of the S&P 500 have reported third quarter numbers. Of these 70.4% exceeded expectations, 9.9% were in line, and 19.8% disappointed. These are strong numbers. Current S&P 500 projected earnings for 2011 are just over $99, and the 2012 number is over $109. They currently project 2012 earnings growth of 10.25% over 2011. A 13 P/E based on these numbers equates to an S&P 500 of 1291 and 1430 respectively. Reported earnings are rising, but projected earnings have not followed suit. Should that change and estimates, which have been coming down, start to go up, that could be another catalyst for stocks to move higher.

In summary, we are in a strong rally and the overbought condition would typically result in a one to two week consolidation. Investors need to be cautious with entry points but with options buyers becoming pessimistic we don't think pullbacks will be too deep. European sovereign debt issues remain as a potential threat to equities, and we continue monitoring for any signs of a global economic slowdown. Based on the S&P 500 the short-term, intermediate-term, and long-term trends are up.

The percent over 10-sma remains overbought as 91.47%. It has been over 50% since 10/4.

Our options indicator has dropped to 0.96, showing the belief among options traders that stocks will drop. It can go lower, but pessimism is a plus that can help sustain a rally.

Our price oscillator, a good indicator of trends, remains in positive territory although it is now at an extreme level.

Thursday had 491 13-week closing highs, the most since 538 on 11/5/10.

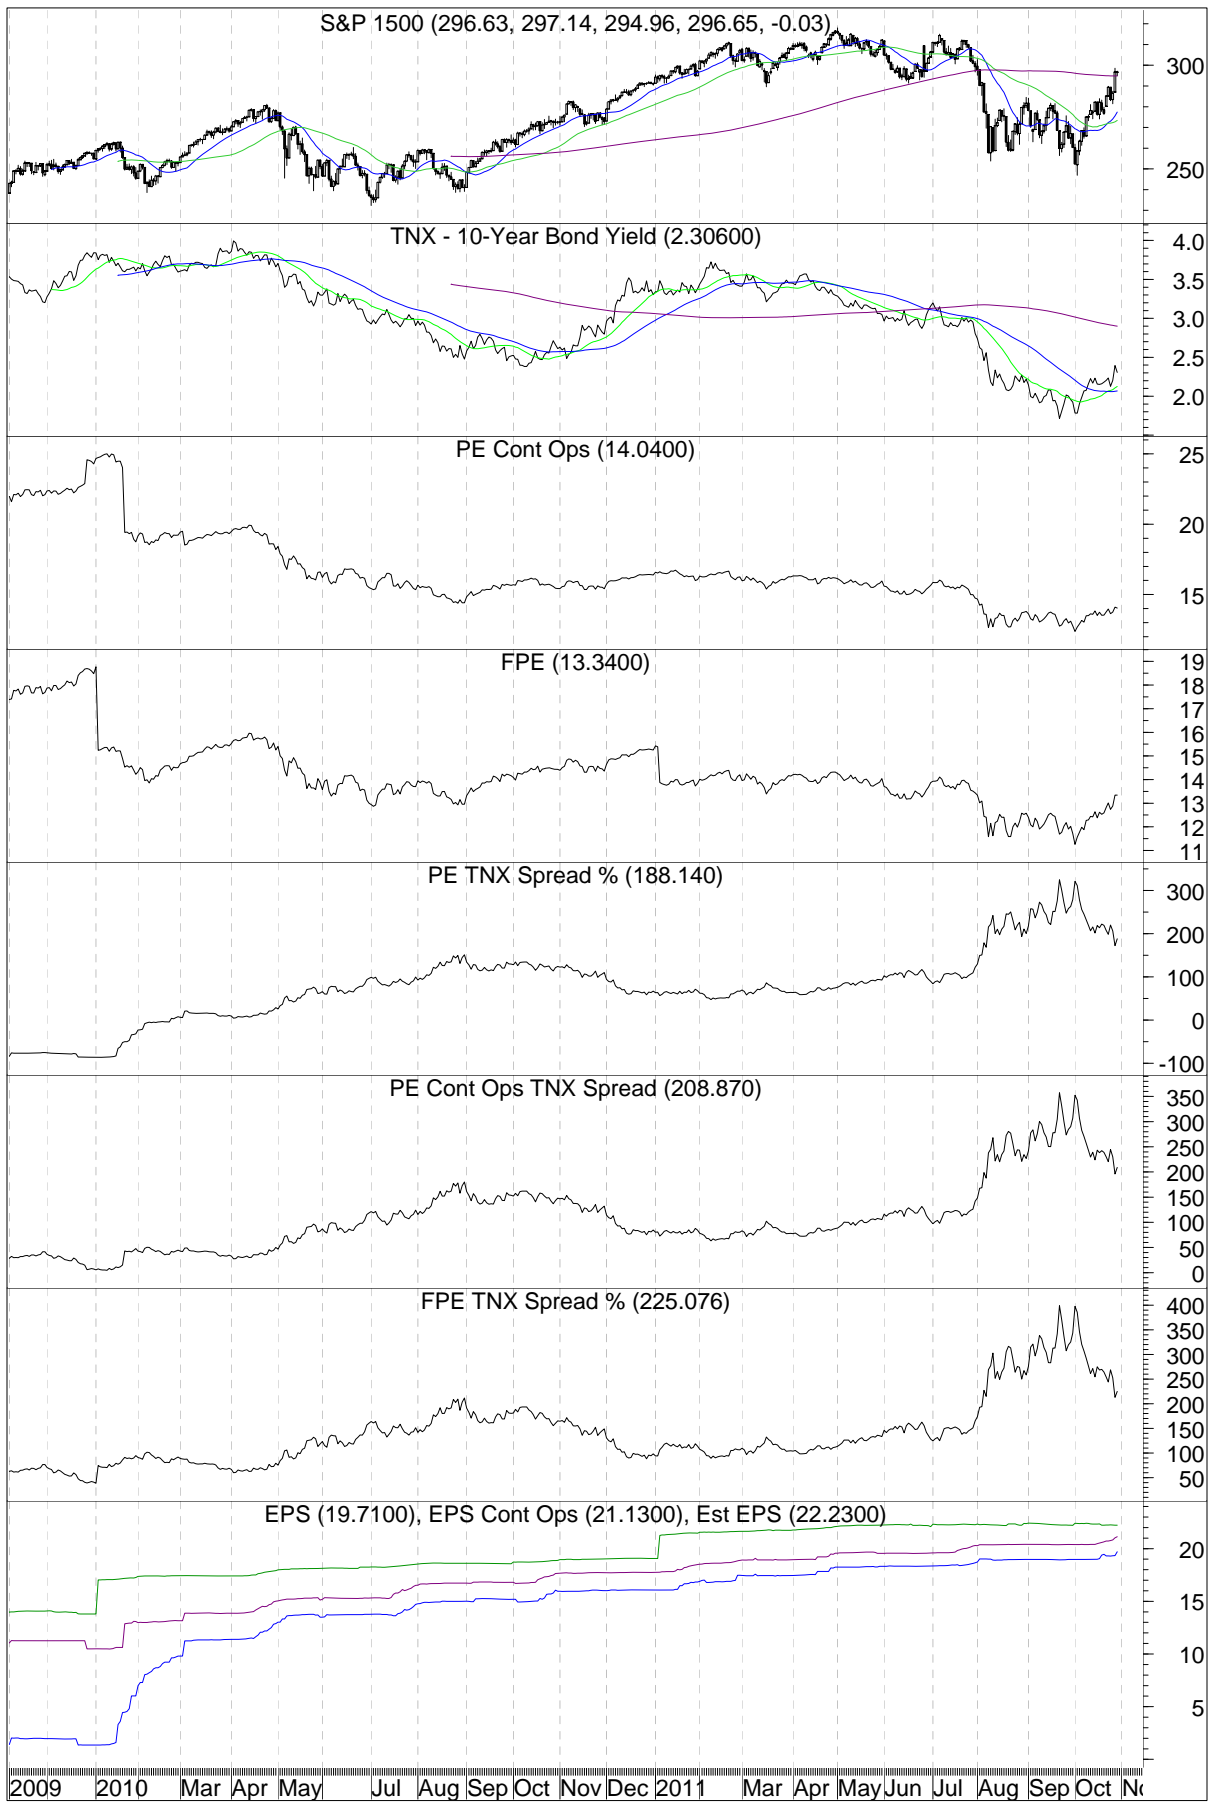

The 10-sma of 13-week closing highs is the most since 7/13/2011.

On Friday 38.65% of stocks advanced. For the week 3 days were over 90% up or down, and that is 7 of the last 11.

The AD line made a new rally high Thursday, the best level since 7/25/11.

The percent over 20 and 50-sma are at overbought levels. The percent over 50-sma is the highest in years, and the percent over 200-sma on Thursday hit the highest since 7/28/11.

The Kaufman Report - Wayne S. Kaufman, CMT

10-year bond yields are above the 20 and 50-sma. The 20 is above the 50.

The current P/E is relatively steady as reported earnings move higher. The forward P/E is rising as projected earnings are not moving higher.

Spreads between equity and bond yields have plunged from the ridiculous levels of a few weeks ago as stocks and bond yields moved up in tandem, but they are still at levels where stocks are attractive versus bonds.

Reported earnings are rising, but not projected. So far 324 of the S&P 500 have reported Q3 earnings. Of those 70.4% have exceeded estimates, 9.9% have been in line, and 19.8% have disappointed.
